BRINGING

CHILDREN

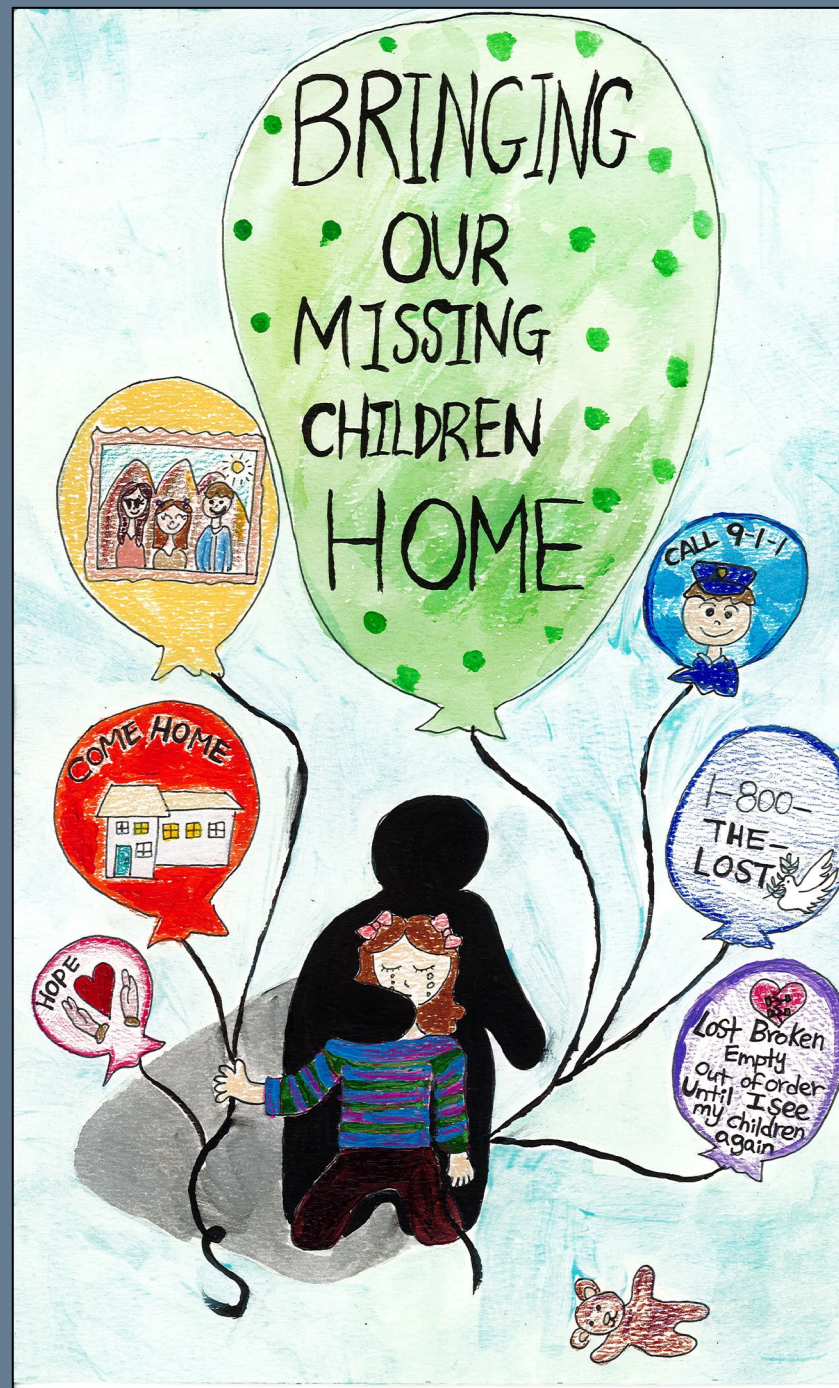

My poster includes a window in the center. I chose to draw a window because through one window, you can see many things happen. In my case, it shows a child being brought home. The first box shows a missing child from the family portrait, the second box includes the child's mother putting up posters, the third box has a police officer looking for the child, and the last box contains the child back with their family.

While making this poster, I imagine how scary it would be to get lost, and just thinking about it for a moment gave me the chills. Even though it feels really scary, I wanted my poster to show that there's still hope. We've got amazing rescue officers and emergency help centers ready to jump in when we call 911. They're the light at the end of the tunnel, helping to find and rescue those who are lost. I drew seven balloons to represent the idea of "lucky seven" while using rainbow colors to symbolize hope in the midst of darkness. Right now, as we look for the lost ones, they'll soon be back in their parent's arms.
